

ENGLEFIELD ESTATE

Land Art Activity

Land art, or environmental art, uses materials 'of the Earth' – the soil, water, stones and vegetation found on-site. Often the art only lasts a short while before the materials used merge back into the landscape.

Some land art is so big, it can be seen from space! Andrew Rodger's Rhythms of Life project covers 18 sites around the world.

Other pieces are really tiny and can simply blow away in the breeze.

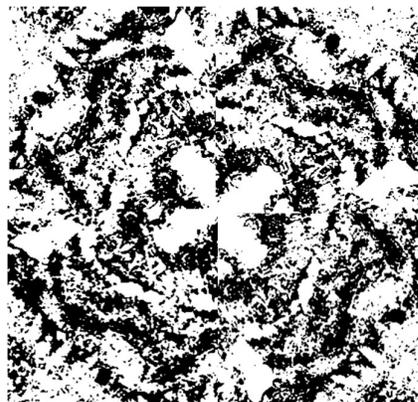

Land art can be any shape – one you think of yourself, or something that follows the natural contours of your location.

You can make your own land art using any materials available to you in your garden or your home. For example, outside you could look for cones, twigs, leaves or daisies.

Inside, you can use things like pencils, Lego, wooden blocks, rice or pasta.

If you are able to photograph your land art, you can manipulate the photo to make something new!

We'd love to see what you come up with. If you upload a picture to social media, you can tag us!
